Résumé ou extrait : Présentation de l'éditeur : "State creation and direct international territorial administration are now beyond their zenith. At present we increasingly witness how, under the impact of various forms of external influence, institutions and constitutional structures are affected within the state, without necessarily affecting its territorial integrity or creating new states. In the face of conflict, such changes are often paired with the introduction of a new constitution and of a transitional period, an 'interregnum', at the end of which a new constitution enters into force. This book analyses conflict-related transitional governance ('TG') -public power exercised by interim governments, transitional councils, etc. ('transitional authorities', in short 'TA') in states said to be in transition- from an international legal perspective. Despite the wide variety of contexts, TG can be conceptualised as a distinct politico-legal phenomenon, partly subject to international law."
