Résumé ou extrait : "The year is 2017. The United States has suffered not only defeats in the High-Tech War of 2007 and the Second Gulf War of 2010, but also a military coup of 2012. That coup, engineered by a highly politicized officer corps that blamed these bloody losses on 'incompetent' civilian leaders, was initially welcomed by a public exasperated with elected government. Only a few years of repressive military rule had passed, however, before the counter coup in 2015. The chastened electorate placed the thoroughly disgraced armed forces under draconian civilian control. The speaker in this essay addresses the twentieth reunion of the Air University classes of 1997, a rather melancholy even under the circumstances. He examines civil-military relations issues emerging in the 1996-1997 time frame that, with the benefit of twenty-first century hindsight, foretold the coming catastrophes. The speaker argues that too many analysts in the 1990s wrongly concluded that the military's acceptance of the shrinking defense budgets and the imposition of social policies on the armed forces 'proved' civilian control was secure."
